

Mohammedan Theories of Finance: With an Introduction to Mohammedan Law and a Bibliography, Vol. 1 (Classic Reprint)

There is indeed some literature bearing upon it in European translations of Mohammedan legal text-books, but the treatment of finance in these text-books is naturally terse and incidental and covers but a portion of the entire subject. Hamilton's English translation of the Hidayah is a case in point. The few chapters in it bearing on finance are at times very inaccurate a defect explained by the fact that the translation was made from a Persian translation of the original Arabic instead of direct from the original and lack all historical perspective. Moreover, they do not give a full insight into the arguments invoked in support of the particular views. The translations into the other European languages unfortunately cannot lay claim to greater perfection, the chief difference among them being their varying degree of accuracy. In this dissertation an attempt has been made to give a comprehensive exposition of the Mohammedan financial theories in their entirety with especial emphasis when possible on the reasons underlying them. To this end all the available primary sources have been used and the divergent views which they contain frequently cited. A body of ancient theories, however, no matter how fully set forth, would convey but little meaning to the modern mind, unless the origin of those theories were indicated and their practical bearings pointed out.
